RESEARCH INTERESTS

Dr. Yan's research focuses on leveraging mobile health and artificial intelligence to develop theory-driven interventions aimed at managing modifiable risk factors of chronic diseases among stroke patients, such as hypertension and high sodium intake. He also explores the involvement of informal caregivers in dyadic interventions to improve care outcomes. His interests further extend to healthy aging promotion, emphasising the enhancement of social connections and support systems among older adults to improve overall well-being. In addition, Dr. Yan is dedicated to advancing evidence-based practices through implementation research, focusing on the translation of evidence into real-world healthcare settings. He is also committed to supporting the career advancement and identity development of male nurses, contributing to greater diversity and growth within the nursing profession. His work has been translated into international health policy and clinical practice, cited by the World Health Organization, the International Council of Nurses, the American Heart Association, and the American Stroke Association in their reports and statements.
